

Medical Billing Careers

One sector of the economy which is still growing even in the midst of the current economic uncertainty is the healthcare industry. One of the strongest growth areas within the industry in terms of employment opportunities is positions in medical billing. After all, everyone employed in the healthcare field, from heart surgeons to lab technicians wants to be paid for their hard work. The medical biller is the person whose responsibility it is to make this possible.

Generally, a medical biller is employed by a healthcare provider (an HMO or a hospital, for instance). Medical billers need to be extremely detail oriented, as they have to accurately input data for insurance claims, field questions from physicians, patients, clerical staff and other hospital personnel, have a good set of problem solving abilities to resolve complaints and concerns when they come up and enter accounts receivable items such as insurance payments when they arrive. Medical billers also have to decide how to get the biggest payment possible from insurance companies who fail to pay up in a timely manner, assist patients in deciding on lump sum payment versus a payment plan and even following up on and reporting delinquent accounts - there are a lot of responsibilities which the medical biller must handle.

In the course of your work as a medical biller, you'll become familiar with medical jargon and find yourself recalling all of your college Greek and Latin (if you took them) in the form of all the prefixes and suffixes used in medical terminology. You'll gain a deeper understanding of human anatomy and learn the names of common diseases and disorders. Of course, there will be times when you need to look up information as well.

In preparing to process medical insurance paperwork, the biller needs to communicate effectively with the physician or lab technician who has performed a procedure. You will need to take the initiative to identify times when a patient is seeing a doctor for a one-time visit and possible follow-up, or whether the doctor wants you to bill a set fee for a series of visits for something like fracture care. You must be able to compare the patient's diagnosis with the procedure that was performed and make corrections if needed. For example, if the patient's last complaint was a cervical neck sprain and he is currently seen for a dog bite, the correct diagnosis must be identified on the insurance form to justify a tetanus shot. The biller becomes a master at decoding the doctor's illegible scrawling: was Benzaclin for acne ordered, or was it Benadryl for allergy?

Throughout all of these responsibilities, you have to develop the personality of a true diplomat. You are dealing with rushed and preoccupied doctors, and they will appreciate your ability to catch on quickly. You will enjoy professional interactions with other medical office staff and technicians. All of this knowledge is available to you through a medical billing course available at Ashworth College. You can step up to the challenge and step into a job in which you'll earn respect from your peers while you enjoy a good living.

About the Author

If you are serious about pursuing a career as a Medical Biller, make sure to look into the options Ashworth College has available. You can do it and Ashworth College can help.

Source: <http://www.healthsnare.com>